RENAISSANCE REVIEW

Imagine the Look, Create the Dream...

Why NOT Permanent Eyelash Transplants?

Recently, because of media attention, patients have been inquiring about permanent eyelash hair transplants. This is a procedure that has been around for more than two decades, and was initially used for trauma or disease-related eyelash loss. We are performing hair transplants to the eyebrows and scalp with regularity, but there are several reasons to be cautious about eyelash transplants:

- The transplanted lashes are not programmed to curve away from the eye, like normal lashes. Therefore, there is the potential for growth in any direction, including towards the eye. An “eyelash perm” is required about every six weeks in order to make the eyelash curl away from the eye.
- Because the transplanted hair needs to be trimmed regularly, there is the potential for inadvertent injury to the eye.
- Lashes which rub against the eye can cause corneal abrasions or ulcers.
- Because of the principle of hair follicle transplantation, if you try to pull a transplanted eyelash that is causing irritation to the eye, it will grow back again from the transplanted follicle. Another surgical procedure with the possibility of scarring would be required to excise the offending transplanted follicle.

The Bottom Line: As with any procedure touted by the media as the “latest and greatest”, you need to be aware of all of the potential complications. I would stick with non-surgical eyelash extensions.
